Safest place for your money? The bank

FDIC-insured Plaza Bank is reassuring its customers that while financial woes plague Wall Street, the safest place for your money is still in the bank.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) was formed after the Great Depression to protect U.S. consumers and their savings. Currently that protection extends to up to $250,000 per account.

"Plaza Bank is well prepared to ride out the economic storm," explained President and CEO Carlos Guangorena. "And our customers should know that their deposits are safe. No customer has ever lost a penny of federally insured deposits."

mission from the start.

To help customers understand the security of the banking industry, Plaza Bank highlights the following facts:

Banks are equipped to handle economic shifts. Banks have significant capital, or a rainy-day fund, on reserve for tough economic times. This is a bank's first line of defense to cover any losses.

No customer has ever lost a penny in insured deposits. The FDIC protects consumers from losing their money if their FDIC-insured bank fails. Even better, the agency has temporarily raised its coverage amount from $100,000 to $250,000 through Dec. 31, 2009. There are legal and safe ways to get even more FDIC coverage depending on how you set up your accounts. Ask Plaza Bank how.
